The way that a volcano gets its shape is determined by the lava. Shield volcanoes have low viscosity lava, described as being basaltic. Shield volcanoes' low viscosity lava means that the lava is more liquid and flows more quickly than thick lava. The sides of these volcanoes are gentle rather than being steep, as the lava travels a long distance before it solidifies. These volcanoes are easily recognisable as being wider than they are tall.

When a shield volcano erupts, it is only explosive if some substance gets into the vent, otherwise they are characterised by low explosivity forming that forms cinder cones and spatter cones at the vent. However, 80% of the volume is lava rather than pyroclastic material.

Shield volcanoes are shield volcanoes composed of basaltic lava that erupts shield lava of the lava which is relatively fluid. These have very low viscosity - a consequence of the relatively low temperature. The fact of shield volcanoes being very low viscosity allows it to solidify which results in the gentle sides of a shield volcano.

A shield volcano contains very little pyroclastic material, except for the eruption itself, where small amounts of pyroclastic material accumulate as a result of the explosive events. Shield volcanoes are therefore formed by relatively non-explosive eruptions of low viscosity basaltic magma.
