This difference makes our procedure more like a large random sample of responses to questions. To give you an example of the idea, picture the following situation. Let's say you're the captain of a ship, and you're trying to find out how many people on the ship are left-handed. You could ask every person on the ship, or you could ask a random sample of people. The latter method is more efficient, and it's more likely to give you the right answer.

The company's chief executive is looking back and will likely emphasize an encouraging first year of growth, especially for global operations. He'll also message optimism for a better second year, especially with new sales from the strong, all-new, five-cylinder Inland engine, now in production. He'll also likely mention the company's 100th anniversary in 2009.
