There is little doubt that the political situation in Mexico during the 1990s was characterized by a change in the nature of the political system. The 1990s began with the transition from authoritarianism to a more democratic system. This change was brought about by a combination of factors, including the economic crisis of the 1980s, the rise of the National Action Party (PAN) in the 1990s, and the death of the long-time ruler, Miguel Alemán, in 1990. The 1990s also saw the emergence of a new political class, the "New Politics" (Nueva Política) movement, which sought to reform the political system and to promote greater transparency and accountability. This movement was led by a group of young politicians, including Andrés Belloso, who was elected as the first mayor of Mexico City in 1997. The 1990s also saw the rise of the National Alliance (Alianza Nacional) coalition, which was formed by the PAN and the National Action Party (NAP). This coalition won the 1995 state elections in Mexico City, marking a significant victory for the opposition.
