African City Life Peter Marris,1968 Young Workers of the Industrial Age Sue Wilkes,2024-12-31 The industrial revolution was forged with the lives of our ancestors children All over Britain children and young people toiled for hours every day Their workplaces were pitch dark mines fiery furnaces brightly lit mills with deadly machines and mud filled brickyards Some workers were pauper apprentices sent thousands of miles from their homes and indentured until the age of twenty one Almost every item in our ancestors homes and wardrobes was made by children and youngsters buttons glass carpets cotton cutlery pins candles lace pottery straw hats and even matches In grand houses and ordinary homes tiny chimney sweeps climbed chimneys choked with soot and boys and girls worked as domestic servants On the land both sexes worked in all weathers Children worked at home too many helped their parents earn a living From the early 1800s men like Robert Owen tried to improve children s lives But reform was held back for decades by wealthy mill owners landowners and politicians who believed that profits were more important than people Sue Wilkes tells the story of the battle for workplace and educational reforms led by Lord Shaftesbury Richard Oastler and the indefatigable factory inspectors But it took many decades to transform society s attitude towards childhood itself Young Workers of the Industrial Age takes a fresh look at the childhoods stolen to create Britain s industrial empire
