The National Grid has finite resources which help power the cables to deliver electricity to houses, during winter high demand for the electricity to be delivered to houses happens because it is colder in the winter and people need to power and heat their homes more during the time, leading to a high demand in power for homes.

By burning gas, it creates heat which powers a turbine then the rotation of the blades from the turbine spins a generator which creates electricity which is then delivered to houses via the power cables/ pylons.
