5. b
6. political patronage
7. inherent powers
8. reauthorize
9. executive order
10. A president's mandate is very important in determining what he or she can accomplish. Presidents who can successfully claim that they have a mandate—that a majority of voters agree with them on an issue—have an easier time convincing Congress to agree with their position on an issue.
11. A president might prefer to pursue an executive agreement when he or she would be unlikely to get the Senate approval that a treaty requires.
12. A president might claim executive privilege when he or she wants to withhold information from Congress or a court about communications between the president and his or her advisers. The Supreme Court has ruled that with certain qualifications, executive privilege is part of the separation of powers.
13. The Council of Economic Advisors was created by the 1946 Employment Act. Its role is to advise the president on domestic and international economic policies.
14. National security is the protection of a nation's borders and territories against invasion or control by foreign powers. President George W. Bush created the Department of Homeland Security to better organize the government's anti-terrorism activities.
15. An American citizen charged with burglary would be tried in a civilian court. A military tribunal tries enemy forces during wartime, while civilian courts try civilians at all times.
