

DBQ Battle at Lexington and Concord

Battle of Lexington and Concord included different type of situations on how the battle started if you look at a Loyalist's perspective compared to a Patriotic prospective. The most important event that occurred in this battle was the "shot heard round the world," which is demonstrated different in both of the documents. In the document of General Gage's Account of the late Battle of Boston stated that the first men to fire were the Americans while in the Document about the King's troops under the command of General Gage which was written but a patriot claimed that the British were the first to shoot with their blood thirst to kill some colonists. Despite the biased opinions shown in the two documents one can determine that the "shot heard round the world" was first fired through the British. To enforce that one can understand why the British were the first to shoot is by the military, political, and social stand point of each other the documents.

The military standpoint of the British was the first factor to convincing why they were the first to shoot in the Battle of Lexington and Concord. The document of Battle of Boston promotes this idea of the first shot by the British indicating how the military was cowering and becoming scared of distant gun fires being shot by colonists to warn near by colonists of a possible sneak attack. This document also supports the British shooting by indicating that General Gage and the troops were ready for a battle and were predicting to fight 500 men but when they met their forces they only seen about 200 men. These men were ready for a fight and were scared to die, they entered a survival mode and once the colonists broke off and ran away stated in both the Battle of Boston document and the Narrative document the British were eager to follow these colonists even though their true mission was to reach the military stores. The British military mission changed from tracking down a store to hunting down these colonists showing their desires to kill these colonists which can be indicated in the two Documents of Battle of Boston, A Narrative, and the Poem of General Gage's confession that these soldiers killed several of the country people, they "thirst for BLOOD and rushed on... firing on this small party," which the small party were colonists, and last the poem states that "Some few Americans have bled, 'tis true, but 'twas the soldiers kill'd them, and not you." The poem states that Gage didn't harm any soldiers but his troops definitely did. The military standpoint changed from the British orders from searching military shops to killing colonists who were not even engaging into a battle but instead doing the opposite and dispersing and running away from the soldiers.

The military standpoint is not the only standpoint that can persuade one that the British were the first to fire in the battle at Lexington and Concord, their political views and standpoints also affected their choice of the first shot into the battle. In General Gage's Account it states the by the Majesty's orders they were to search for military stores which was their first intention from the march of Boston to Concord. As the soldiers were marching to the Concord they heard scattered warning shot made by the colonials which first indicated that the colonists were scared that soldiers since the Indian-French war were living in their homes due to an English policy that forced homes to take care of British soldiers and the colonists feared that these soldiers were about to pop out and surprise strike them. The second effect this created was that the British soldiers were angry and scared that the Colonists may be making an army to face the Majesty. These soldiers came from Boston which was already under major rebellion groups and had new
