The Revolution: Path to World War: Episode 5 (1776-1777)

1. December 1776. At a secret location along the French coast, a shipment is being prepared: rifles, uniforms, ammunition, and munitions are crated and loaded, bound for America.
2. Franklin arrives into a deeply divided nation, no place more so than Paris itself. The wealthy live in opulence, while the poor walk on city streets while sleep in poverty and excitement.
3. Elsewhere long, all the fashionable women are wearing their hair in a style that mimics Franklin's hair style.
4. Back in New Jersey, the Continental Army is in bad shape. The Americans have not yet figured out how to feed and supply the army.
5. America's ally in Paris, Benjamin Franklin, has made his last overtures to the French, an attempt to get the European power to join in the fight against their age-old enemy, England.
6. The British plan requires precise coordination across great distances.
7. Fort Mifflin sits on a peninsula, surrounded by three waterways. But the lone American force can only defend two of them.
8. And now the British Army is on the move. 7,000 British soldiers are heading down the Hudson. The next stop stationed in New York City.
9. Franklin's silence is a calculated diplomatic strategy, akin to his favorite game, chess.
10. Washington immediately sets his army in motion, marching west through Philadelphia.
11. The Continental Army has successfully held off the British advance for weeks, but all of that is about to change.
12. Back in the Colonies, America's northern army is getting ready for a fight that will mark the tide of the war.
13. For the Native Americans, it is a marriage of convenience. A British victory is their best hope for protecting their land against the westward-pushing American colonists.
14. But Burgoyne's reaction is too little, too late. The killing of McCross becomes a call to action.
