The Romans were some of the greatest builders in the ancient world. They took many ideas about architecture (the science of building) from the Greeks. The Romans also had architecture of their own. They learned how to use columns and arches in their buildings from the Greeks and Etruscans. They improved on the arch by inventing the dome, a roof formed by rounded arches.

The Romans also made new building materials, such as concrete. They mixed lime and soil, which would harden when it dried. Roman architects used this to build huge structures like the Colosseum.

World History: Impact of Rome DBQ Activity

Roman cities began to grow quickly to be the largest and most populated in the world. Water was very scarce. The Romans had to find ways to bring water into the cities. It's to the plumbing engineers of the Old Roman Empire that the Western world owes its allegiance. Their solution was to take water from distant wells or natural springs. They built stone structures called aqueducts to carry water. The aqueducts went through mountains, across valleys, or even across towns. The Romans made more than 200 aqueducts. Many can still be seen today.

The Greeks already developed hot and cold water systems, but they never developed hot water systems as extensively as the Romans. Furnaces heating hollow bricks located under the entire floor supplied warm air for the Thermae bath. As the name suggests, the Frigidarium was the cold water bath; it fed the hot water tanks and other baths. The Tepidarium contained baths of moderate heat, and the Calidarium the hottest.

How did the Romans solve the problem of bringing water into their growing cities?

What were aqueducts, and why were they important?

How did Roman bathhouses use hot and cold water differently?
