Abstract: This study's overarching goal is to assess whether the observed patterns in the impact of technology on the environment are consistent with the theoretical predictions of the environmental Kuznets curve (EKC) hypothesis. The study uses a panel of 100 countries from 1990 to 2010, and employs a series of econometric models to test the EKC hypothesis. The results show that the EKC hypothesis is supported for the majority of the countries, with the turning point occurring at a higher level of income than previously estimated. The study also finds that the impact of technology on the environment is heterogeneous across countries, with some countries showing a strong positive impact and others showing a strong negative impact. The study concludes that the EKC hypothesis is a useful tool for understanding the relationship between technology and the environment, but it is important to consider the specific context of each country when interpreting the results.

It could also be the case that the two different subgroups of the sample are not comparable. For example, the two groups may differ in important ways that are not captured by the variables in the model. For example, the two groups may differ in their access to health care, or in their health status. If these differences are not captured by the variables in the model, then the results may be biased.
