ABSTRACT

Objective: To study the frequency of teenage pregnancy and its complications as compared to controls.

Methods: A retrospective case record analysis of 2522 pregnancies, aged below 25 years was carried out, in the Department of Obstetrics, Riyadh Armed Forces Hospital during the period 1 January 1999 to 31st December 1999.

Results: The incidence of teenage pregnancy for 1999 was 6%. Three hundred and eighty five (76%) were carrying their first pregnancy while 42 (8%) mothers had 2 or more previous pregnancies and deliveries. The birth weight was less than 2.5 kg in 109 (21.5%) adolescents, as compared to 187 (9%) of the controls. The rate of instrumental deliveries and cesarean section in adolescents was 9% and 6% as compared to 5% and 10% in the controls. Seventy nine (16%) of adolescents delivered prematurely as compared to 216 (11%) of the controls. Forty seven (9%) of adolescents were unbooked compared to 133 (7%) who were controlled. The incidence of pre-eclampsia and preterm delivery in adolescents was 2% and 16% as compared to 1% and 11% in the controls.

Conclusion: Teenage pregnancy, which showed a steady decline from 18% in 1979 to 6% in 1999 was associated with a significantly higher risk of preterm delivery, pre-eclampsia, low birth weight and instrumental delivery.

Adolescent pregnancy occurs in all societies, but the level of teenage pregnancy and childbearing varies from country to country. The reproductive pattern in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is characterized by pregnancies starting at an early age, by high fertility throughout the reproductive span, by low educational attainment of the mother and by poor coverage by antenatal services.¹ Low maternal age has been found to increase the risk of a number of pregnancy complications, preterm delivery, low birth-weight, and elevated risk of prenatal and infant mortality.² Adolescents and their children represent a population with an increased risk for medical, educational and psychosocial problems.³ Women who begin childbearing in their teenage years face a variety of problems during pregnancy and in later life. They have higher rates of poor obstetric and neonatal outcome, lower educational achievement, higher rates of poverty and welfare dependence. They are less responsive to their infants and may be more prone to child abuse. Their children perform less well, than children of older mothers on intelligence and vocabulary testing, and are more likely to have behavioral problems and fail at school.⁴ Adequate child spacing is considered a beneficial factor for the health of mother and child. This is increasingly realized in the Western countries. It is also observed in some other countries as a measure to control population growth. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is one of the countries where family planning is not usually practiced, resulting in a high birth rate. The total annual deliveries at the Riyadh Armed Forces Hospital (RAFH), Riyadh, Kingdom of Saudi Arabia have increased steadily from 1377 deliveries in 1979 compared to 7860 deliveries in 1999. Like other pregnancies, teenage pregnancies, need not end, in the birth of a baby. There may be a miscarriage or the pregnancy may be terminated by abortion.⁵ In the United States of America (USA), abortion rather than childbearing is more frequently the option of choice.
