Establishment of Reliable Methodologies to Determine In-situ Moisture Content of Base and Subgrade Soils Richard Liu, 1999 Pavement life span is often affected by the amount of voids in the base and subgrade soils and especially by the soil moisture content Time Domain Reflectometry TDR and Ground Penetrating Radar GPR are two desirable techniques to indirectly measure the in situ soil moisture content through electrical properties of soils The pre purchased Tektronix 1502B TDR Cable Tester equipped with Campbell Scientific SDM1502 Communications Interface and PS 1502B Power Control Module system was successfully modified installed and integrated into the existing weather station in conjunction with the Texas Mobile Load Simulator TxMLS research project The test sections were located on US281 near Jacksboro Texas The TDR results from US281 test sites indicated that the TDR sensors responded to the rainfall events favorably The two year field test results indicated that the TDR readings interpreted by Topp s 1980 and Ledieu s 1986 equations agreed well with the real measured value for the subgrade none of the existing models for the base layers was found to be suitable for the soil moisture content conversion used in this research study An empirical equation was established to determine the weight based moisture content of the compacted base materials Although the TDR system provides valuable information it requires considerable time and effort to process data In addition the TDR system consumed too much power and caused malfunctions of the weather station In that regard a new Moisture Sensor MS system was developed in this study and verified at the Materials and Tests MAT section of Texas Department of Transportation The results from MAT section indicated that the MS system provides a more reliable solution than that of the TDR system In addition it is much easier to process the MS data Furthermore the MS system consumes almost no battery power and is an ideal solution for a long term monitoring of pavement moisture content GPR was also employed at the same test sites The Inversion Method was applied for converting moisture content of soils Laboratory tests were satisfactory yet the field application of this study needs further experiments to improve the results Equipment Improvement Report and Maintenance Digest ,1989 Micro-scale Spatial
