

Notching and drilling

Flame joints should not be excessively notched or drilled. Please refer to the 'Upper Floors' section for further guidance.

Concealed services

If the services are hidden in walls or floors, they need to be positioned so that any significant cracking of the surface cannot occur.

Services in framed walls

In addition to general provisions for the installation of services, the following are of particular note for timber frame construction external walls:

- The routing and termination of services should not affect the fire resistance of the structure.
- Electrical services are to be rated for their location with consideration for insulation.
- Service penetrations through the VCL should be right-fitting to restrict air leakage and the passage of moisture vapour.
- Avoid running electrical services in the external wall cavity, except for meter tails.
- Services should be protected with metal plates if they pass within 25mm from face of stud.
- Adequate allowance for differential movement to occur without causing damage should be provided for rigid services rising vertically through a building.
- Services that pass through the external wall cavity and provide an opening (such as meter boxes) should be enclosed with a cavity barrier and protected with a cavity tray.

Please refer to the 'Internal Walls' and 'Upper Floors' sections for further guidance.

Chasing of masonry cavity walls

If chases in walls are necessary, their depth should not exceed:

- One-sixth the thickness of the single leaf for horizontal chases.
- One-third the thickness for vertical chases.

Hollow blocks should not be chased unless specifically permitted by the manufacturer.

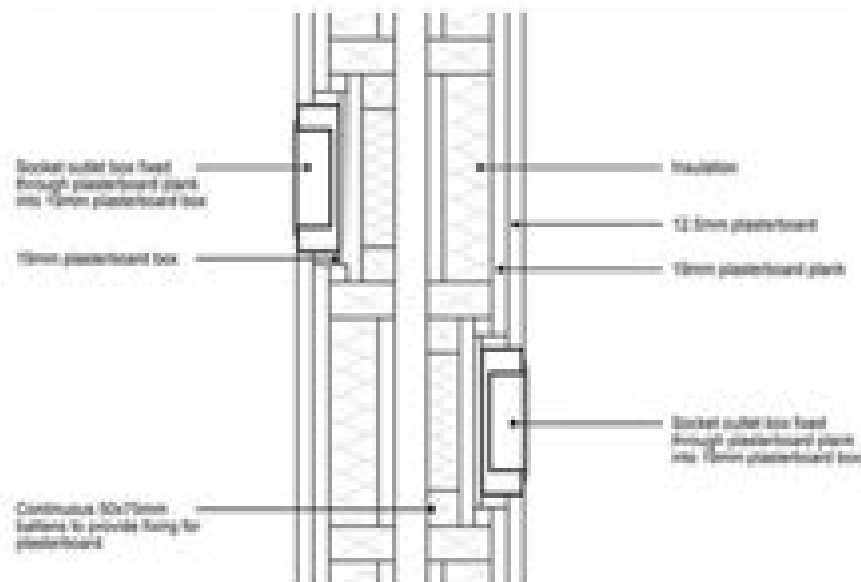

Fire stopping

Fire stopping is required around services that penetrate fire-resisting floors, walls or partitions.

If proprietary systems are used, they should be installed using the manufacturer's recommendations.

Please refer to the 'Internal Walls' and 'Upper Floors' sections for further guidance.

Staggered services on party walls (section plan view)

Please note: The insulation services within a party wall should not compromise the sound or fire resistance.
