

The Black Death

We would not be where we are today if it were not for the millions of people that died because of the plague, if it were not for this event in history much of human development would of have been severely stagnated, leaving us with a bleak outlook on not only medical breakthroughs but also human reasoning. Without a doubt the Black Death was one of mankind's most arduous trials, one that spanned the course of nearly three years and resulted in an accelerated growth in human innovation, economic progress, and unexpectable social reforms.

Contrary to popular belief, the Black Death may not have actually been spreaded by rats and fleas, but instead numerous theories have risen that have substantial claims that the presences of rats in Europe during the medieval ages were insufficient to have any profound effect in the spread of the disease. Not to mention that even the northern most part of Europe, some of the coldest regions such as Norway and Iceland, were affected by the Black Death and yet those biomes are severely out of the range of tolerance for any rat to inhabit. As stated in Susan Scott's "Some Scratchy Issues Concerning the Black Death", "I refer to Gunnar Karlson, "Plague Without Rats: The Case of Fifteenth Century Iceland" ... Karlson looks in vain for rats in Iceland even though Iceland experienced two fifteenth-century rampages of what was surely the Black Death." Scott also notes that if the Black Death was a plague then it was, "a disease of rats that men participate" then as a result the plague bacillus would without uncertainty spread from rat to human when a rat dies. If that was the case then there should've have been many references to the numerous build-up in rat corpses.

Instead of the traditional theory of attributing the plague to the spread of "Yersinia Pestis" as given by Ole J. Bendictow, "The Black Death was an epidemic of bubonic plague, a disease caused by the bacterium Yersinia Pestis that circulates among wild rodents where they live in
