

APPLICATION OF LINEAR PROGRAMMING ON PROMOTION PROBLEMS

This thesis deals with the application of linear programming to solving problems in the area of publicity. The emergence of linear programming is a consequence of the development of the so-called operational research. Linear programming is intended for the allocation of scarce resources in order to achieve optimal results. The aim of this thesis is to show that many problems in the field of advertising can be solved by using mathematical programs on the computer. The thesis consists of four chapters. The second chapter will briefly describe the linear programming history, and will list the people who contributed most to linear programming. It will be defined and explained the concept of linear programming. The basic settings of mathematical modeling of problems will be explained, and the areas of possible application of linear programming will be specified. The standard formulation of the linear programming problem will also be displayed. The third chapter will explain the WinQSB computer program and the module for linear and integral linear programming. The most important procedures for resolving mathematical models of economic problems through this program will be described in detail. The input of the input data, the possibility of the subsequent modification of the set conditions, the storage of the model and the results for later use, and the like will be displayed.

The fourth chapter will show the resolution of selected examples of advertising problems using the WinQSB computer program, more precisely its module for linear and integral linear programming. The eight selected examples will be elaborated and detailed description of the process of obtaining a mathematical model, as well as the process of
