READING + QUESTIONS

The desert stretched before Jugal like a sleeping beast, its golden fur rippling under the breath of the wind. He shielded his eyes as the sun blazed overhead—an unblinking eye that watched his every step. Clutched in his hand was a fragment of an old wall, its edges worn and cracks faked like whoppers' feet in time.

As he trilled up the towering dune, the sand heaved beneath his boots, rising in little clouds like ghosts of travelers past. At the summit, he paused. The air shimmered with heat, and for a moment, he thought he saw the outline of a door flickering in the distance—then it was gone.

Jugal reached the base of the dune and brushed away a layer of sand. Beneath it lay a stone slab, etched with symbols that pulsed faintly, like the beat of a hidden heart. When he placed his palm on it, the ground trembled. A warm wind spiraled around him and carried a voice that whistled not with sound, but memory.

He had found Echo Dune—and the story it had waited centuries to tell.
