 Richard Dauenhauer,1975 The present thesis is the first to study the relationship of text and context in Tlingit oral tradition and to demonstrate the congruence of Tlingit oral literary structure and social structure Oral publication of stories songs and speeches follows patterns of exchange common to reciprocity of other goods and services Basic to this congruence are the Tlingit clan and kinship systems and the concept of ownership of oral materials Ownership is recognized by audience and tradition bearer alike and is usually stated in the oral text itself although it seems to have been edited out of most written publications The method of the thesis utilizes a combination of three critical approaches The functional emphasizes the individual tradition bearer his reaction to folklore research his attitude toward his material and the effect of oral composition on the Tlingit community The oral formulaic addresses problems of style and compositional devices and provides explication and exegesis in general The structural approach extends observations on the text and field observations into the dimension of social structure Leaf 1 Shakespeare Translation ,1977 ... Annual Proceedings National Association of Corporation
