Diversity is key to good journalism in a pluralistic society – whether diversity of topics, journalists or sources.¹ Women continue to be underrepresented in newsrooms (24 percent) and as expert sources in news stories (26 percent).^{2,3} Although women are included as sources in 48 percent of health news stories, the Woodhull Study on Nursing and the Media: Health Care's Invisible Partner, published in 1998, found that nurses were identified as sources in only 4 percent of quotes or other sourcing in health news stories in leading print national and regional newspapers and 1 percent in weeklies and industry publications such as Modern Healthcare in September of 1997.⁴ Nurses were never cited in health news stories on policy and were rarely identified in photos accompanying the articles. Named after Nancy Woodhull, a founding editor of USA Today, the study raised awareness that the voices and perspectives of the nation's largest group of health professionals – now 3.5 million, almost 90 percent of whom are women⁵ – were largely invisible even when they would have been germane to the story.

Twenty years later, are nurses used as sources more often in health news stories in print media? This research brief presents high-level, preliminary findings from a three-phased study to answer the following questions:

PHASE 1. Are nurses represented as sources and identified in photos in health news stories in public and trade print publications with greater frequency than in 1997?

PHASE 2. What do health journalists perceive to be the barriers and facilitators to using nurses as sources in new stories?

PHASE 3. Are schools of nursing using social media to highlight the expertise of their faculty?
