3. Purposiveness: The foregoing research has started with a definite aim or purpose. The focus is on the effect of personality characteristics and emotional reactivity on the trading performance of investors.

Testability is a property that applies to the hypotheses of a study. A hypothesis is a tentative, yet testable, statement, which predicts what you expect to find in your empirical data. Hypotheses are derived from theory, which is based on the logical beliefs of the researcher and on (the results of) previous, scientific research. A scientific hypothesis must be testable. Not all hypotheses can be tested. Non-testable hypotheses are often vague statements, or they put forward something that cannot be tested experimentally. The hypotheses that Sam has developed are definitely testable.

Objectivity: The conclusions drawn through the interpretation of the results of data analysis should be objective; that is, they should be based on the facts of the findings derived from actual data, and not on our own subjective or emotional values. For instance, if we had a hypothesis that stated that greater participation in decision making would increase organizational commitment, and this was not supported by the results, it would make no sense if the researcher continued to argue that increased opportunities for employee participation would still help! Such an argument would be based not on the factual, data-based research findings, but on the subjective opinion of the researcher. If this was the researcher's conviction all along, then there was no need to do the research in the first place! Sam's conclusions are based on the research findings.

4. To test these hypotheses Sam recruited 50 volunteers from a six-week training program for day-traders offered by Rose Bush, a well-known professional futures trader. The big question is: is there reason to believe that these day-traders have a different profile than other day-traders on the variables under study. For instance, because Rose Bush has specific demands or selection criteria.
5. A. A good theoretical base and a sound methodological design add rigor to a purposive study. Rigor connotes carefulness, scrupulousness, and the degree of exactitude in research investigations.

B. If we omit a variable that is correlated with both an included independent and the dependent variable, we will introduce a bias in the estimates of the effect of an independent variable on the dependent variable (this is called omitted variable bias). The nature (over- or under-estimation of the estimate of the effect) of the bias on the included independent variables depends on the nature of the correlation between (a) the dependent and the excluded variable and (b) the included and excluded independent variables. The size depends on the amount of correlation between the excluded and included variables. In this case, we don't know the nature and the degree of covariance. If the estimates of the effects are heavily biased, then we should be very careful with the interpretation of the results of this study.

Note that the requirement that we include all variables that are correlated to both our independent variables and our dependent variable places a heavy burden on our data collection methods. To some extent, the requirement is impossible: it is impossible to
