- Epigenetic (genetic) changes occur along the life course, increasing risk for later chronic disease
- Epigenetic = generation of a cellular gene expression
- Epigenetic refers to those changes in the expression of genes, without
- Epigenetic regulation of the above said. The word "epigenetic" (epigenome) refers to the cellular control system that is able to turn genes on or off in a cell. These are mechanisms that control the way genes are expressed. Genes that are "switched on" produce proteins that do what they are supposed to do. Genes that are "switched off" do not produce proteins.
- How epigenetic changes of the above occur: The body's DNA contains instructions for how to build proteins. The instructions are written in a code that the body's cells can read. The body's cells use the instructions to build proteins. The proteins then do what they are supposed to do. The body's cells also use the instructions to build proteins that are not supposed to be there. These proteins can cause problems. For example, they can cause cancer.
