1.1 INTRODUCTION

“Development” is the process by which some system, place, object or person is improved from one state into another. Norton et al (2010) report that “development” involves change in growth or expansion. The term carries the connotation that the change is in the direction of growth and advancement. However, we cannot separate development and economic growth because when the economy grows, people will have better jobs and be in a position to develop themselves materially. Pass et al (1993) argue that, at a country level, economic development refers to a process of economic evolution involving a rise in the gross domestic product (GDP) and per capita economic growth, as well as the structural transformation of an economy through industrialisation. Therefore, economic development is about improving people’s standard of living (Norton et al 2010).

Annually, the World Bank’s World Development Report – that most developing countries have low income levels and a low gross domestic product (GDP). From an agricultural perspective, development refers to a high agricultural share in the GDP and the creation of sustainable jobs. “Rural development” refers to an improvement in all those activities that affect the wellbeing of rural populations. This includes basic services, such as access to food, health services and water supply, basic infrastructure (roads) and the development of human capital through education. It can also refer to increased autonomy in decision-making, empowerment, gender equity and participation, among others. Regarding agriculture, rural development leans towards technical change by introducing innovations that enable farmers to produce more. However, the notion of producing more food without considering its impact on the environment has been challenged in the past decade or so. Some argue that development programmes should be environmentally friendly to ensure that natural resources are conserved for future generations.

The reason why agriculture and rural development are almost inseparable is that most agricultural activities happen in rural areas. Therefore, agriculture contributes significantly to the economy of rural areas, especially in developing countries. Investing in agricultural development programmes is likely to improve the income of rural people. In general terms, a rural economy is one that depends on land (in either a productive or spatial sense) as the major resource.

In South Africa, land is not simply a productive resource. It is also a refuge and a welfare system for those who are excluded from the benefits of the mainstream economy. In addition, it provides a sense of community and cultural continuity in a hostile world. In the interim, it must be acknowledged that the majority of South Africa’s rural communities (called “rural communities” because of their relative dispersion) are – in economic terms – “displaced urban communities”.
