These authors also found that the use of a single, non-validated questionnaire to assess the prevalence of depression in the community is not sufficient. They also found that the prevalence of depression was higher in the community than in the clinical setting. This suggests that the prevalence of depression in the community is higher than in the clinical setting. This is likely due to the fact that the community is a more diverse population than the clinical setting. The community includes people of all ages, ethnicities, and social classes. The clinical setting, on the other hand, is typically composed of people who are seeking treatment for a mental health problem. As a result, the 1990s have been a decade of change for the U.S. economy. The economy has grown at a slower rate than in the 1980s, and the unemployment rate has risen. The economy has also experienced a period of technological change, with the rise of the Internet and the growth of the service sector. The economy has also experienced a period of globalization, with the rise of multinational corporations and the growth of international trade. The economy has also experienced a period of environmental change, with the rise of environmental concerns and the growth of environmental protection efforts. The economy has also experienced a period of social change, with the rise of social issues and the growth of social movements. The economy has also experienced a period of political change, with the rise of political issues and the growth of political movements. The economy has also experienced a period of cultural change, with the rise of cultural issues and the growth of cultural movements. Abstract

These results suggest that the use of a single, standard, and simple questionnaire can be used to assess the prevalence of a wide range of mental health problems in a community sample. The questionnaire was found to be a valid and reliable measure of mental health problems, and the results of the study suggest that it can be used to assess the prevalence of a wide range of mental health problems in a community sample. The questionnaire was found to be a valid and reliable measure of mental health problems, and the results of the study suggest that it can be used to assess the prevalence of a wide range of mental health problems in a community sample.
