Abstract: Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported depression among the adult population in the United States and to examine the association between self-reported depression and sociodemographic factors, health status, and health care utilization. Methods: Data were obtained from the 2002 National Health and Medical Examination Survey, a nationally representative survey of the U.S. population. The prevalence of self-reported depression was estimated among the adult population. The association between self-reported depression and sociodemographic factors, health status, and health care utilization was examined using logistic regression. Results: The prevalence of self-reported depression was 10.1% among the adult population. The prevalence of self-reported depression was higher among females than males, among those with lower education, and among those with lower income. The prevalence of self-reported depression was higher among those with chronic health conditions and among those who had visited a health care provider in the past 12 months. Conclusion: The prevalence of self-reported depression is high among the adult population in the United States. The association between self-reported depression and sociodemographic factors, health status, and health care utilization suggests that self-reported depression is a complex phenomenon that is influenced by a variety of factors.
